The National Institutes of Health (NIH) has issued a new era of patient- and disease-centered engagement in research. The January 7, 2014 publication of the "Policy for the Redesign of Clinical Research Regulations" noted: "NIH is committing to a new era of patient- and disease-centered research." The key words are patient- and disease-centered research. These are not new ideas: they're in the Hippocratic Oath, in the Declaration of Helsinki, in the Nuremberg Code and in the Declaration of Tokyo. Is there a new evidence and ethics case, however, for patient- and disease-centered research? After all, "patient-centered" is the scientific word for "observational" and "disease-centered" is the scientific word for "basic" research. Ten years ago, I wrote an essay for an online magazine called Telemedicine &

Bioethics. In the title “Revisiting the Nuremberg Code and the Declaration of Helsinki,” I said: “The Nuremberg Code emphasizes the importance of understanding the patient’s perspective and of respecting patient autonomy as core ethical principles.” I also wrote: Empirical evidence exists that excellent outcomes, such as increased survival rates and fewer side effects, result when patients are involved in the decision-making process. The Nuremberg Code defines patient-
