diagnostic challenges on the pharmacy recommendation rate. To evaluate how various diagnostic tests impact the pharmacy recommendation rate for antimicrobial therapy. A prospective cohort study. A 42-bed general medical/surgical intensive care unit at a university medical center. One hundred fourteen patients with microbiologically documented infections who received at least one antimicrobial, based on laboratory results. None. The diagnostic test results that were included in the initial work-up for each patient were extracted from the medical records. Only those tests included in the work-up at the time the initial culture was obtained were considered. Sixty-one percent of initial antimicrobial recommendations met with the patient's final culture outcome. Of 20 patients for whom the initial diagnostic work-up included only a gualitative urine screen, 65% had an altered urinary antigen result, which could have altered the antimicrobial treatment recommendation. Similarly, only 34% of patients for whom the initial laboratory result included a guantitative analysis of plasma procalcitonin values had their antimicrobial therapy altered because of this test result. Twelve percent of the recommendations made to patients when laboratory tests included both a qualitative and quantitative test had no impact on the patient's final culture result. Diagnostic tests used in the work-up of microbiologically documented infections impact the pharmacy recommendation rate. As the total number of positive diagnostic test results increases, the impact of the test on the final culture outcome also increases. Transit center, soon. Vancouver is getting a transit center. The first Canadian city to announce its plans for a new transit center in the coming years is Montreal and construction is expected to start by the end of this year. The government is doing the planning, but the work is likely to be picked up by a private operator, which will eventually be charged with running the facility. The new facility, which was announced during Montreal Mayor Denis Coder e79caf774b
