Our analyses revealed that greater relative weight was associated with lower all-cause, CV-related and cancer-related mortality among the US adult population. In stratified analyses, relative weight was consistently associated with lower mortality across sociodemographic subgroups, particularly in men. These findings remained robust after adjustment for multiple covariates, including demographics and multiple medical conditions. It is widely recognized that abnormal nutritional status can lead to adverse health conditions, such as heart disease, stroke, cancers, chronic kidney disease and diabetes.^[@bibr3-0962280218795289][@bibr4-0962280218795289]--[@b d0c515b9f4

Hey there! Welcome to episode twenty-two of Mega Crit Radio! This is Jenny Johnston and I'm here in the studio with Josh, and we are just getting started. I'm going to go ahead and cover the planned topics for our broadcast. In past broadcasts we've talked about most of the major events, local stories, and current topics in the community.

But there are a few upcoming events we haven't talked about here on the show. There's the bikefest and we've still got the upcoming fair at the air show there at the red cross. I also have some news of an upcoming show for the next couple months that we haven't talked about here. Some of the features are the upcoming show at the local cinema, a couple of the group projects in march, and I'm going to be adding a couple of new features, so we'll talk a little bit about those in this broadcast. I know with the additional time we have to devote to this broadcast we're going to be covering some topics that we might have otherwise skipped over. So I'm just going to briefly go over those subjects in this broadcast. The next topic we're going to cover is, in jenny's category we talked about the big crash in
