The story always is true. If you are single, you are not missing something big. You need to be with the right person. You need to be happy, and after that all the rest of the world can be there to stay with you. I'm not a fan of multi-stage projects because at some point you have to take a look back. What would I do differently? I do recognize that this is a trickier problem to solve than, say, having the ability to inject the code, or even the ability to do a software update. One thing I do think is important, though, is to establish what to concentrate on first. The first few weeks of the project were used to overcome my own learning curve, as well as to understand what they actually do. There was never a wrong answer as to what "the next step" should be at any point in time. I'm now fairly confident that whatever is implemented next will make the system better. "I'm interested in react without Redux," is a rather common question in our community. There are two sides to this question, and they are pretty interesting. React not being Redux is a completely different approach from React with Redux. While I understand the reasoning behind React without Redux, I'm surprised that something so popular isn't used on a daily basis. I don't work on a daily basis with React, but I do work on a daily basis with React Native, and I have to say I'm very impressed. As a matter of fact, I use React Native on an ongoing basis. So I would say, on of the things that React gives you is to quickly hook up solutions to problems. For example, you are building a simple activity stream in your app.
